Researchers at the Colorado School of Mines and their colleagues are synthesizing new polymers which bring together superacidic metal oxides with organic monomers. The result is a new material hybrid which can transport protons at high temperatures without using much water. These materials will allow fuel cells to be designed for use in hotter and drier environments.